The program's interface takes the analogy from the actual room of the home in which the software resides, opening to a "drawing room" where the user works with various tools, palettes, and layers to create an image or design. 1. Start Photoshop. 2. When the program opens, click the Photoshop button in the menu bar to start it up. 3. To access the user guide, click the Help button, which opens the Help window (see the bottom of Figure 2 **).

Photoshop is divided into various drawers, or areas, that contain specific tools. Here is a sample of a typical user's path through the Photoshop interface from start to finish.

1. Click the File tab and then the New button to access the New Screen. You may choose to access this screen at any point in the application and from any screen.
2. Use the New Screen to create a blank canvas for your work or to open an existing image.
3. Click the Image button.
4. Click the first, or Browse button, which opens the screen shown in Figure 3 **.

[Formation of neurones in the mouse embryo hemopoietic system during the development of the hematopoietic microenvironment]. Hemopoietic precursors are induced to proliferate in the bone marrow in response to growth factors produced by bone marrow cells, which are called hemopoietic microenvironment. The formation of hemopoietic microenvironment is a complex process which includes formation of the bone marrow, the sinusoid network and the lymphoid tissues. The role of the endothelial cells in this process is still unclear. We have studied the expression of the beta 1 integrins alpha 3 beta 1 (ICAM-1) and alpha 4 beta 1 (Mac-1) on cells of the hemopoietic microenvironment in the mouse embryo. The following observations were made: (a) endothelial cells express alpha 4 beta 1 as well as alpha 3 beta 1, they are both induced by growth factors (b) endothelial cells of sinusoids and metarterioles express alpha 4 beta 1 and not alpha 3 beta 1, which is induced by growth factors (c) endothelial cells of lymph node sinusoids and metarterioles express both integrins and are induced by growth factors (d) macrophages, which are in contact with endothelial cells, express alpha 4 beta 1 and not alpha 3 beta 1 and can be induced by growth factors. In our games, we want the computer to play like the human player, so we try to create a player that can actually act like the human player. That is done by using the full, unaltered game state — the game rules and environment state. The player is not simply a specification of moves that could be made, but rather moves that are made, and consequences of the moves. But since computers play so fast, they don't always play in the exact same way as humans do. To allow computer players to actually feel like a human, we want to make the computer act the same way the human would act. This is done by using a Human-Computer Interaction (HCI) technique called "scaffolding"

[Jackson et al., 2009]. Scaffolding is like thinking of the player interface as a scaffold. When building a structure, often we need a scaffold in the first place to get the structure to start. Once the structure is complete, we remove the scaffold. For the designersQ: Internet Explorer 6 doesn't execute Javascript code I am experiencing a very strange problem while developing my web application. When running it in Firefox or Chrome is working fine, but when I run it on my server for IE6 is not executing the Javascript code properly. Here is my html code: The contents of the init.js file are:

window.onerror = function () { window.location.href = '/error.html'; };

This is working fine in Firefox and Chrome, but it does not work in IE6.

I guess that this is because IE6 doesn't execute the Javascript code of the init.js file, but I don't know what to do now. A: Add one more script A:
