Increased fibroblast-platelet interaction induced by perfluorochemicals: a mechanism for promoting fibrosis. Perfluorochemicals (PFC) are widely used as plasma expanders and surfactants. Recently, they have been shown to enhance fibroblast proliferation and collagen synthesis. We now demonstrate that PFC induce changes in platelets to generate platelet-derived growth factors (PDGF) and increase their binding to fibroblasts by approximately 75%. This increase in platelet-derived matrix-derived growth factor in PFC-exposed fibroblasts was a time- and concentration-dependent process. In addition, PDGF stimulated fibroblast-associated fibronectin synthesis and migration. PFC increased the synthesis of PDGF by 10% (p

Inaudible: A personal call to action on the social determinants of health. Social conditions are considered the root cause of health issues, and thus interventions to improve health are often classified as ameliorating the social determinants of health. While this has been the traditional rhetoric, there is growing appreciation for the important role that the social environment plays in health and the complexity of interacting social conditions. We describe the issues that arise when health care is focused on individual responsibility, and the subsequent challenges that arise when health care professionals are addressed as 'silent bystanders'. Procion yellow XR-II for the display of blood products. Electrochemical oxidation of the redox-active, cationic red Procion Yellow XR-II is used to coat glass. Oxidation of Procion Yellow XR-II is induced via anodic polarization on the glass surface. This modified glass exhibits a distinct magenta color (when viewed against white light), changes in reflectance with pH, and, when mixed with blood, changes in apparent color of the products of the coagulation process, namely, fibrin and fibrinogen. By careful selection of the coupling agent for the glass surface, Procion Yellow XR-II may be rendered adsorbed, relatively stable, and able to withstand exposures to saline, dilute acid, or proteolytic enzymes. It was demonstrated that Procion Yellow XR-II coated glass is an effective colorimetric indicator for the Increased expression of MMP-9 in the portal vein of cirrhotic patients with hepatocellular carcinoma and in experimental animal model. Hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) is one of the most common malignancy of the liver and the incidence is increasing worldwide. The matrix metalloproteinase-9 (MMP-9) is capable of degrading basement membranes, and plays an important role in the invasion and migration of cancer cells. This study was designed to investigate the role of MMP-9 in cirrhotic patients with HCC and its relationship with pathophysiological and immunohistochemical markers. One hundred and five cirrhotic patients with HCC and 30 cirrhotic patients without HCC were included in this study. The relationship between the MMP-9 and the pathophysiological and immunohistochemical markers of cirrhosis, such as alpha-fetoprotein (AFP), vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF), and the proliferation marker, proliferating cell nuclear antigen (PCNA) were investigated. The median value of plasma MMP-9 was significantly higher ($p = 0.000$) in cirrhotic patients with HCC compared to cirrhotic patients without HCC. The median values of AFP ($p = 0.003$), VEGF (p
