Relapse prevention is the cornerstone of successful drug treatment for opioid dependence. Recent findings have emphasized the importance of enhancing extinction learning to reduce the probability of relapse. The effects of opioid antagonists on the extinction of opioid-related behavior was evaluated in the present study. The effects of single and repeated administration of naltrexone (0.1 and 1.0 mg/kg) on morphine-induced conditioned place preference (CPP) and conditioned locomotor response (CLR) were examined in male rats. To examine the effects of naltrexone on morphine-induced relapse, subchronic administration of naltrexone (0.5 mg/kg) was given daily for 6 days.

Naltrexone attenuated the acquisition of morphine-induced CPP and CLR and suppressed the expression of the morphine-induced CPP and CLR. In contrast, naloxone, the antagonist of opioid receptors, had no significant effect on the acquisition and expression of the morphine-induced CPP and CLR. Administration of naltrexone for 3 days following the extinction of the conditioned place preference and the conditioned locomotor response to morphine resulted in the expression of the extinguished behavior. In addition, naltrexone treatment administered during the induction of morphine-induced CPP and CLR, but not during the extinction of these behaviors, significantly attenuated the expression of the morphine-induced CPP and CLR. These results suggest that the subchronic treatment of naltrexone during the extinction of morphine-induced CPP and CLR may provide a new approach to the management of opioid dependence and opioid-induced craving. of AAAs, suggesting that they represent the higher grade of thrombotic potential. Furthermore, the higher incidence of recurrence in the Stanford classification has been linked with the risk of subsequent formation of an AAA. The findings of the present study are subject to a few limitations. This study was performed at a single institution, and the number of the study patients was not large enough to draw firm ca3bfb1094

Q: Can I configure the document root for a LAMP stack in CentOS? I am not a linux expert, but I'm interested in setting up a LAMP stack on my web server. I see that there is a package called LAMP, but I cannot find anything to let me set the document root to my root directory. Is there any way I can do this? A: First you should check if you are running php or not, if not you could start from the beginning with centos, and as usual If you are running php, you could check if you have installed the apache module to accept.htaccess files: yum install httpd-devel yum install httpd-mod-authn-file yum install httpd-mod-authz-default To verify if you have the module installed, just write (in console) yum info httpd-mod-authn-file and you should see: Installed: 3.3.2-10.el6.centos Installed-size: 1413 If you have no luck using the packages from the official centos repository, here is a working tutorial on how to create your own repository.

Q: Does the U.S. government guarantee a job for life to military retirees? It is well known that military personnel are granted the right to receive a monthly pension at retirement, but it is not well known whether they receive a job for life. Some reports of the past have military personnel joining the military as teenagers, have very limited job experiences (e.g. military occupational specialties which may or may not transfer to civilian jobs) and then as young adults are left essentially jobless (though such jobs exist that allow for military personnel to transition from the military to a civilian
