What's new:

In December of 1949, a series of events took place at the Industrial Amphitheater in that nation's capital, Washington, DC. These events helped launch Jerry Lewis into the world of cinema. In October, the Hollywood film industry, nervous about the wave of protest against its monopoly over big-screen entertainment in that month's "Hollywood opening extravaganza," Warner Bros. decided to "relax the old rules" and provide a preview of the December blockbuster that they were releasing. Biz-Brits Charles (or C.C., as he would later be known) Kerkorian and Louis B. Mayer, the heads of two of Hollywood's titans, agreed to heed the warning of MacKinnon C. Wilber, the head of the Motion Picture Association, that "it is not widely appreciated that the exhibitor never has any say in the production of a motion picture." It was in fact the exhibitor, the person watching the film, who supplied the largest share of box-office revenues at that time, 57 percent, and was usually the biggest bad guy in "Hollywood-land." Worse, it wasn't as if the film producers hadn't known that exhibitors made the vast bulk of the money from the films they released. It was an open secret. Since the 1930s, studio accounting was basically laughable, so the producers had been able to estimate that the exhibitors probably accounted for $75 million of the $102 million the industry was making when they refused to show what they frankly conceded was a bad picture. So it would be all right to show a preview, wouldn't it? The $102 million the industry was making would go for prints, advertising, promotion, and so on, but the exhibitors never saw a penny of it. The film industry was operated as an absentee landlord, at best. The most they could hope for was a straight lease on a venue, and even they would count any overage against their lease payment. Producers and directors were stunned in October when Wilber met with them in London and told them that, thanks to the British Board of Film Censors, they could not use Hollywood stars such as Bing Crosby in any American film without first showing a pro forma preview. Another major difference was that the entire English production and distribution system insisted on censorship. Instead of being cut into pieces and shipped bit by bit across the Atlantic by pink-o peanut vendors, British films were distributed in three
