Since the liberal media gave Barack Obama a pass in the 2012 presidential election, when he went for weeks without mentioning his Muslim faith, you'd think they'd be willing to revisit his actual positions on Islam to see if he's changed. That's what the media should be doing, but they seem to be looking for the wrong questions. Even after Obama said we can't "combat extremism with cynicism" and that Islam is not "some foreign perversion," one of the most vocal defenders of the president, Paul Farhi of the Washington Post, said, "You can't use that as a litmus test." Wow, what a profound and edifying sentence: "You can't use that as a litmus test." I'm not going to digress and dig through Obama's whole stump speech and the sermons he's given and try to find any indication that he's changing his mind on this issue. But it's good to have this reminder that we can't use the president's position on Islam as a litmus test on whether he's making a good deal of progress on the issues he actually cares about.

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a steering wheel for vehicle and more particularly to a steering wheel for vehicle having an airbag device.
2. Description of the Related Art Heretofore, the steering wheel for vehicle is constituted by a boss portion and a pad portion in which a ring-shaped steering shaft is fitted to the boss portion. The cover is attached to the boss portion so that the airbag is housed in the cover and the pad portion, so as to be inflated in the case of collision. In the steering wheel for vehicle, the airbag has been provided separately from the boss portion, in which the cover is attached so as to cover the pad portion. Therefore, in the case where the cover is attached to the boss portion, it is necessary to provide a space for the airbag and to attach the airbag to the cover in
